"80TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE DEPORTATION OF THE SOVIET PRISONERS OF WAR TO AUSCHWITZ"

After the start of the war with the Soviet Union, in July or August 1941, a new group of prisoners numbering about 200 people was brought to the camp. Rumors went around the camp that the new arrivals were commissars from territory occupied by the Germans. They wore civilian clothes. These prisoners were treated in an exceptionally inhumane way... I remember that the Lagerfhrer [camp director; Karl Fritzsch at this time] ordered them to be employed in the gravel pit that was located not far from the Blockfhrerstube [the guardhouse next to the Arbeit macht frei gate], across from the prisoner kitchen. Before long there was a deep hole there. Fritzsch ... gave the Kapos to understand that they were to liquidate these prisoners. From then on, it was judgment day. As they worked, the Kapos and the SS beat them unrelentingly with rifle butts, clubs - anything that fell to hand. The corpses were thrown into wooden crates that the others had to carry to the crematorium. We sometimes watched these scenes through the fence, and we knew the rest from stories.

Excerpt from an account by Adam Jurkiewicz, APMA-B (Archives of the Auschwitz-Birkenau State Museum). Statements Collection, vol. 76, p. 66.
